The aim of this study was to define the role of the complement factor H (CFH) gene as a predisposing factor for Pemphigus vulgaris (PV) and other autoimmune diseases. Ninety-seven unrelated PV patients and 101 unrelated healthy controls from Turkey participated in the study. The CFH polymorphisms were determined by polymerase chain reaction and Restriction Fragment Length Polymorphism analysis. The frequencies of genotypes and alleles of CFH (rs800292, rs1061170, and rs572545) were compared between PV patients and controls. The genotype and allele frequencies of CFH (rs800292) in PV patients were significantly different from those of controls (pQ: refreshing Datatable after ajax request I'm

We have been developing Fedora Virtualization for quite a while now, and there are some things in the final release that I think are worth paying attention to. One of the aspects that I think is really important in the adoption of new technologies is how easy it is to get started with them. I was excited to attend the VMworld Europe 2011 conference this year, and was really looking forward to the VMware keynotes on container and virtualization concepts. There, VMware announced a new incubation program called Joyent Container Cloud, and released some new technologies and sandbox. Here's what I found out at VMworld 2011 about containers, Joyent Container Cloud, and the work Red Hat is doing. VMware announced a few days ago that they've started a new Incubator Program in the Container Cloud space. While the program is sponsored by VMware and Joyent, and a few of the big names in containers and cloud (e.g., Eric Hammond of U&I), we at Red Hat have been working with these technologies for a while. Red Hat Virtualization is a distribution of Fedora, a Linux distribution with a long history of being the basis for many open source technologies in production use, not just the Red Hat product you've heard of. I'll get back to the first point about containers, and containers being in Fedora in a minute. Here's a couple of slides from what's going to be a pretty short summary, followed by some comments and follow up questions for you to dig into further. People have been using containers for a couple of years. The first thing that people did was to put different software components (e.g., databases, load balancers, etc.) inside of a container, making their life as easy as possible. VMWare Datacenter Virtualization (
