A method for high-throughput detection of Trichinella larvae in animal samples, the LAMP, was developed based on a new single-copy, nested DNA target recently identified by Next-Generation Sequencing (NGS). The technique is based on a helicase-dependent DNA amplification (HDA) that was adapted to amplify the single-copy gene, a modified version of the Trichinella nDNA mini-exon (mini-exons represent an evolutionarily recent class of genes in the helminth parasite Trichinella) and was tested for its specificity and sensitivity with the larvae of several Trichinella species and in other parasitic helminths. As a proof of principle, the LAMP method was applied to 501 samples from pigs in China and Italy. After the development of the methodology, 576 out of 501 samples tested positive for Trichinella larvae by microscopic techniques or LAMP (κ = 0.701). The detection limit for larval DNA was 0.001 pg and LAMP was able to detect as little as 10 times that amount of DNA. This protocol will be used for high-throughput screening in the field and will ultimately provide the basis for the development of robust molecular assays for the clinical diagnosis of trichinellosis.Q: Synchronized properties of HashMap I want to synchronize the hashmap and its key/value objects so that if one thread holds the object, other threads can only get copies. I am trying to do this by having a wrapper class (named Temp) around the map, that holds the map as well as a lock on the actual map. The idea is that when a thread wants to get the value of one of the keys, it calls get(). It is synchronized to the temp object rather than the real object. So, the get method of the Temp object synchronizes the Temp object, and no other thread is able to call the get method in between, as the lock is on the Temp object 04aeff104c
